As a teenager, Deacon Robert Winn was riveted when he first heard the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. give his "I Have a Dream" speech on television 50 years ago.

"That speech was so moving. I just listened and listened and listened,"

The movie Selma, which opens in theaters nationwide, provides a depiction of one of the most pivotal points in the civil rights movement. The events that occurred in Selma, Alabama in the early part of 1965, particularly Bloody Sunday on March 7, led to the passage of the Voting Rights Act of 1965. The movie explores many facets of the Selma campaign including the relationship between Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. and President Lyndon B. Johnson, interaction among different segments of the social justice movement, the fierce resistance by state and local officials to the opening up the ballot box to all races, King family dynamics, brutal beatings, and much more.

The film has received four (4) Golden Globe Nominations
